

Peter O'Neill: revitalising the PNG-Australia relationship

By Ashlee Betteridge
18 October 2011

The O'Neill-Namah government has a solid development agenda and is looking to improve governance, invest in infrastructure and deliver better education and health services to Papua New Guineans.

This was the crux of the message delivered by PNG Prime Minister Peter O'Neill during his lecture at the ANU last week at a Development Policy Centre event.

In a speech that addressed the challenges facing Papua New Guinea with refreshing frankness, the Prime Minister outlined his government's plans for reform ahead of elections slated for 2012.

He also explained the reasons behind the change in government that saw him take the PM position in August this year. Citing leaders who became reckless during former PM Sir Michael Somare's lengthy stint in hospital, as well as concerns over misappropriation of the PNG development budget, O'Neill said that MPs on both sides of parliament were left with no choice but to take "assertive and corrective action" to deal with those who were not prudently attending to their civic duties.

While the title of O'Neill's lecture was 'Revitalising the PNG-Australia Relationship' and the close ties between Australia and PNG were substantially discussed by the Prime Minister, the content also had a heavy focus on domestic policy reform for economic and social development.

O'Neill emphasised his government's desire for national unity and its resolve to curb policies that had held back social development in the past. He outlined a number of policy priority areas: provision of universal education; improved healthcare for all; rehabilitating and maintaining of key economic infrastructure; clearing government systems of poor and corrupt practices; and creating an inclusive environment for PNG women.

According to the Prime Minister, some progress has already been made on these goals, including proposed legislation to facilitate the participation of women in parliament, the beginnings of work on the establishment of an independent commission to fight corruption and improvements in resource allocation for education and health in the national budget.

In analysing the PNG-Australia relationship, O'Neill said that the bilateral partnership is currently at a watershed moment where the development cooperation treaty between the countries will begin to transition into an economic cooperation treaty as trade and economic relations further strengthen, particularly through regional agreements such as PACER Plus.

His prediction for the future of the Australia-PNG relationship was that it will only continue to grow and strengthen further.

O'Neill delivered his lecture to a full house at the Crawford School's Molonglo Theatre — an audience which included many PNG students who will make up the next generation of talented leaders that the Prime Minister acknowledged in his speech.

The Prime Minister allowed a generous amount of time for questions from the audience and answered each question comprehensively. For example:

- O'Neill said he would raise concerns about West Papua and issues near the Indonesian-PNG border with President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono during talks next month.
- O'Neill expressed the opinion that China's entrance into the Pacific Islands should not be considered a threat, as all countries were increasing their terms of trade with China at present. He added that PNG was primarily looking for an economic relationship with China rather than a political one.
- In response to a question on women's participation in PNG civic life, he replied that the government was hoping pass legislation in November to enable women to hold more positions of leadership in the parliament.
- Stating that PNG stood ready to re-engage with Australia on offshore asylum seeker processing on Manus Island, he added that a regional solution needed to be found, not only for Australia, but also for PNG and other Melanesian states facing irregular migration.

- Most popular of all with the audience, O'Neill made a commitment to pass legislation on dual citizenship in the November session of parliament.

Some of the other topics touched on in the discussion included service delivery to districts, whether PNG would ratify the UN convention on disability, housing affordability solutions, and how the capacity of the PNG defence force could be enhanced through Australian aid.

A full video of the lecture and question and answer session with the Prime Minister can be viewed here.

Photographs from the event can be viewed at the Development Policy Centre Facebook page.

What did you think of Prime Minister O'Neill's presentation? Let us know in the comments section.

Ashlee Betteridge is a Researcher for the Development Policy Centre.

About the author/s

Ashlee Betteridge

Ashlee Betteridge was the Manager of the Development Policy Centre until April 2021. She was previously a Research Officer at the centre from 2013-2017. A former journalist, she holds a Master of Public Policy (Development Policy) from ANU and has development experience in Indonesia and Timor-Leste. She now has her own consultancy, Better Things Consulting, and works across several large projects with managing contractors.

Link: <https://devpolicy.org/peter-oneill-revitalising-the-png-australia-relationship20111018/>

Date downloaded: 20 April 2024

Australian
National University

The Devpolicy Blog is based at the Development Policy Centre, Crawford School of Public Policy, College of Asia and the Pacific, Australian National University.